Precarious Inclusion: Studying Ontarian LGBTQ+ parents' experiences childrearing in a post-legal parity framework

Are you an LGBTQ+ parent with a child who is under the age of five years old living in Southern Ontario?

Are you interested in participating in a 1-1.5 hour interview about your experiences of inclusion and discrimination?

A team of LGBTQ+ parents and researchers at the University of Guelph are conducting a study to learn more about what it is like to raise a child in this time of political backlash and equal legal LGBTQ+ parenting rights.

We would like to know how other forms of discrimination impact your experiences as an LGBTQ+ parent. We also want to learn how your experiences as an LGBTQ+ parent influence how you care for and protect your children. Study results will lead to new knowledge about how LGBTQ+ discrimination exists in the current political climate and lead to improved LGBTQ+ inclusion.

Each participant will receive $25 in cash as a thank you for your time for participating.

To learn about your everyday parenting experiences, interviews for this study will focus on learning LGBTQ+ parents' everyday experiences when:

- Accessing childcare and education programs
- Encountering the law and/or police
- Participating in community, religious, political, cultural events or groups
- Accessing drop-in centers and recreational services
- Accessing reproductive services or healthcare for your child
- Accessing social services, Newcomer programs, language services
- Participating in parenting groups or communities
- Encountering strangers, acquaintances, neighbors, family members and friends
- Completing forms like Declaration of Parentage, your child's Birth Certificate, Health Card, and Passport.

If you would like to be contacted for an interview, please email the Study Lead, Julia Gruson-Wood, by email at: jgrusonw@uoguelph.ca.
